

Icelandic Language

The Icelandic language is the closest to Old Norse that still exists today. Icelandic is a Nordic language that shares roots with Danish, Norwegian, Swedish and Faroese. Danish and Faroese are the most similar. Icelandic is the least widely spoken language of the five.

The @everyinglewordiniceandic page on Instagram is run by Eunsan Huh. Illustrations and pronunciation videos can be found on her page. The videos would be extremely helpful for anyone who wishes to learn pronunciation of Icelandic words. She even has written and illustrated a book as well as the same name as her page.

There are Icelanders across Canada; though Gimli, Manitoba is one of the more prominent locations. The University of Manitoba offers classes in Icelandic language as well as poetry and mythology. There are many other options to learn the language to be found online that may be more, or less interactive including YouTube and other tutor-based platforms.

See Nordic Languages: What's The Difference? | Wordminds for reference

University of Manitoba - Icelandic Language and Literature \(umanitoba.ca\)